The book is divided into five sections, each of which focuses on a different aspect of Nichols's life and career. The first section, "The Early Years," includes essays by Nichols's childhood friends and family members. The second section, "The Actor," features reminiscences from Nichols's fellow actors, including Meryl Streep, Dustin Hoffman, and Robin Williams. The third section, "The Director," contains essays by Nichols's collaborators, including Steven Spielberg, Nora Ephron, and Elaine May.

The fourth section, "The Friend," is a collection of personal reflections from Nichols's friends, including Tom Hanks, Diane Keaton, and Warren Beatty. The fifth and final section, "The Legacy," includes essays by critics and scholars who examine Nichols's impact on American culture.

Throughout the book, Nichols emerges as a complex and contradictory figure. He was a brilliant artist who was also a flawed human being. He was a generous friend who could also be fiercely critical. But above all, he was a man who loved life and who lived it to the fullest.
