Software:

- Computer software is the part of a computer system that software professionals build and then support over the computer's lifetime.
- It is a collection of instructions that enable a computer of any size and architecture, running the operating system, to perform a specific function. And test their instructions in both hardware and software environments.

Characteristics of software:

- Although there are similarities between software development and hardware manufacturing, but few activities are fundamentally different.
- (ii) In both activities, high quality is achieved through good design, but the manufacturing phase for hardware can introduce quality problems that software cannot.
- (iii) It is not subject to wear and tear.
- Hardware components suffer from the growing effects of dust, vibration, aging, temperature extremes, and many other environmental conditions. Simply stated, the hardware begins to wear out.
- Software is not susceptible to the environmental conditions that cause hardware to wear out. In theory, therefore, the failure rate curve for software would take the form of the "bathtub curve".
- When a hardware component wears out, it is replaced by a spare part.
- There are no software spare parts.
- Early software errors are usually an indication of a problem in the process through which design was translated into machine-executable code.
- However, the software errors that still exist after a system is deployed are those errors considered more complex or more difficult to detect.
